A structured, well planned crossbreeding program can play a significant role in the profitability of a commercial cattle operation. Crossbreeding allows producers to complement the strengths of two or more breeds. For example, one parent breed might excel for muscling and growth, while the other parent breed is more maternal. In addition, a crossbred calf will have additional production from heterosis.

1. Heterosis is reported as a percentage improvement in the trait of interest.
2. Heterosis improves the performance of lowly heritable traits, like reproduction.
3. Heterosis will not overcome poor breed choices or sire and replacement selection.
4. Crossbred cows have more lifetime production from maternal heterosis.
